Poems

Poems are really meant to stretch your imagination. You don't have to have anything, except lines and stanzas. I love writing poems because they really capture a moment. When I reread my poems, I think that they are great. I really like hearing the little voice in your head, your "poets voice" because it makes everything so easy. you don't have to do anything. I really like keeping my mind "open bowl" and letting the poems to stay in, rather than being "closed bowl" or "cracked bowl" because that lets the poems get away. it's like the poems are precious liquid gold, and you wouldn't want to pour gold into a bowl that is upside down or cracked, because then all the gold would slip away. It's the same thing with poems. I have a lot of poems, and I really liked writing them, because it's like you open a window. and you only focus on one thing. That is why I love poetry.

Meaning Something

My poems really meant something to me because they are amazing. They are amazingly fun. They capture the moment so amazingly. Everything about poetry is just so amazing. I love the warm feeling I get when I start writing a poem. The feeling I get, the amazing happiness. I really liked imagining a poem about a place, while I imagined what it would look like. But the sheer beauty of poems is being able to fit all of that into just a few lines.
